Foreword

In these latter days, when words have been used with such skill as to remind us again that the pen is mightier than many armies, it occurred to us that the most potent list of words obtainable was such as could be found in the admirable addresses of President Woodrow Wilson.

We, therefore, set to work on the pleasant task of reading those 75 addresses, containing over 175,000 words and classifying them. The final list contains 6221 different words as set forth in the following pages. They are arranged alphabetically, grouped according to the length of the words. The average length of word consists of 7.7 letters. In the classroom the list should be invaluable. Students cultivating a good classic style of English, would do well to study the list assiduously. Students of spelling and shorthand could not get a more usable list. With these words, one should be able to express almost anything desired; and should find them a great improvement on the artificial, and farcical compilations of most text-books.

While studying these words we would suggest that a thorough reading should be given to Mr. Wilson's addresses, and many of the passages memorized. American ideals are there expressed, in language so clear and so just, that they should be known verbatim by all good Americans. Those who most admire the literary artistry, so effectively operative in those addresses, will not be unwilling to undertake this loving enterprise.

We purpose later to afford an opportunity of using this vocabulary in a practical manner.

BANNELL SAWYER.

NEW YORK CITY, OCTOBER, 1918.
